Why did you want to become an author?

The biggest reason I became an author is to continue to use my imagination. Telling my stories gives me a well needed outlet to express my imagination in a positive way. I never want to lose that one part of me that can inspire and share itself with the readers of my stories.

Any other books in the works?

*There are 7 and a half more books in my series. I also have 2 other plays in the works and a couple joint efforts: A comic strip called Literal Euphemisms, an anthology, and a couple children's books. I have so much to do!*

What song title best describes your writing ethic?

*My first pick is The Hardest Thing by 98 Degrees. (We laugh) ...Do you want inspiring or do you want honest? Sooner or Later – Breaking Benjamin – Sooner or Later I will get it done but it (his writing) will get done.*

What is one book everyone should read?

*Oryx and Crake By Margarette Attwood. – A future world where everything has gone to shit. (Might edit) – The disintegration of modern society.*

One food you would never eat?

*Only one? (We laugh) Haggis! Somehow the thought of eating a stomach does not appeal to me.*

Insane Sanity - Screenplay

Insane Sanity is a gripping example of the inner struggle and turmoil that abuse can cause. The author, Mike Deregowski, causes you to ask a lot of questions about insanity through his dark imagery and scary adaptation of my short story, Writing On The Wall. I recommend this screen play to any reader, writer, or actor who is looking for the challenge of questioning reality! – Kelsey Hoopel

Tell me about one of your proudest moments being a published author?

The first time I was asked to do a reading for a grade 6 class. My very first public reading I did where there was more than 5 people. (He laughs) They were interested in me as a person. One question was "you don't only write, what do you do? What's your day job?"

Just interacting with a group of people that have honest criticism and then to see genuine interest in my work was amazing! Even a few months later my book is still being asked for at the library. It tells me I am going in the right direction and lets me toot my own horn a little bit. It's feels nice to be proud of your own work.

What's one piece of advice you would give aspiring authors?

Don't be afraid to try and don't be afraid to experiment with your writing. Just because you can't write in one medium now doesn't mean there isn't another you would excel at. When I was young I hated poetry. Now I write it.

KCI Thoughts

Interviewing the business owners I have had the privilege to represent, really inspired me to think about following your dreams and living your passion. Mankind, as a species, has an inner desire to be important, as stated by most Dale Carnegie training. People want to be remembered and cared about. I believe that finding the right path that matches with your beliefs is tricky, but making an honest living with the skills you possess and the passion for what you love is the best way to become important to the only person who truly matters most - yourself. Once you find what drives you to be happy, what inspires you to be better, and makes you get up in the morning, then you will find the human need to be important will be fulfilled by your own desire. This will inspire others to follow. Lead and love by example.
